MICHAEL STEVENSON [b. 1964]

Call Me Immendorf 2000

Silkscreen on paper

Collection of Jim Barr and Mary Barr

In his project Call Me Immendorf, Berlin-based New Zealand artist Michael Stevenson zeroes in on the controversial visit to Auckland in 1987 of German neo-Expressionist painter Jorg Immendorf, an international art star almost as famous at the time for his lifestyle as for his paintings. The local art scene fell short of the celebrity visitor's expectations, and New Zealand media made the most of the fallout, which included a death threat to Immendorf and the relocation of the artist from a modest flat to the Hyatt Hotel.

Stevenson's project could be called a docufiction – an artwork that redraws yesterday's news to gain a clearer view of the present. The ten newspaper advertisements here connect the cultural ructions created by Immendorf's visit with the economic 'revolution' shaking New Zealand in the 1980s, drawing a parallel between the local art world's struggle for international credibility and New Zealand's struggle to become a player in the so-called global economy. Stevenson's account of events then is no less relevant now: both struggles continue today.

Encompassing banners, drawings and sculpture as well as the prints seen here, Stevenson's project coolly dissects the romantic myths and cultural ambitions that converged in Immendorf's visit. But in the fervour of its research and the rigour of its execution, Call Me Immendorf is itself a hugely ambitious work.
